Editorial Review

About the Author

Michael Riscica is a licensed Architect, living in the beautiful city of Portland, Oregon, with his yellow Labrador Retriever. After graduating from architecture school in 2007, he began taking the AREs in 2009 while the exam was in the middle of transitioning from ARE 3.1 to ARE 4.0. He quickly completed it and actually enjoyed studying for the CDS, PPP, SPD, and SD exams—due to the fact that much of the information helped him with his day job at a firm. During the recession and in the middle of unemployment, Michael failed the structures exam. This all forced him to take a short break from the ARE for a little while... Which before he knew it, turned out to be 1.5 years! At the end of 2012, Michael became really frustrated with not being a licensed architect. At this point, not having a license to practice architecture was holding him back from advancing his career and building his own business. He was also starting to run out of time with the 5-year rolling clock and the old 6-month wait after failed exams. Michael spent the entire year of 2013 very aggressively studying, obsessing over, and taking 4 AREs. He passed his last exam in October 2013 and was licensed in December 2013. While studying, Michael would frequently say: “With all the time, money, and energy I have put into passing these exams, I could have built a very successful business.” Immediately after becoming licensed, he transitioned all of his momentum into using his license, taking on more projects, and starting to share his experiences on his blog YoungArchitect.com.
