Relationships. The word alone elicits a whole spectrum of responses from a whole variety of people: from the young to the old; from the positive to the negative; from the knowing to the curious; from the wise to the dumbfounded; from the liberal to the conservative; from the religious to the secular, etc. As a concept we can all agree: It is a fundamental characteristic of our human experience. There is no one anywhere in the world who has not been, is not now, or will not be in a relationship of some kind. So what is this thing we call relationship, and why do we do it? The discourse in this booklet is an account of the author's experiences with romantic relationships, and some of the experiences of people who have shared their sentiments in single's seminar, relationship workshops, and counselling sessions with which he was involved over the years. It is not a scientific study of the subject matter, nor does it represent a literature review. The text that follows is intended as a personal reflection on relationships, and is based primarily on anecdotal accounts supplemented by various quotes that are pertinent to the topics presented and that hopefully prompt further insights. The opinions expressed are strictly the author's, unless otherwise stipulated.
